

THE HARVARD
independent
04.13.17 THE STUDENT WEEKLY SINCE 1969

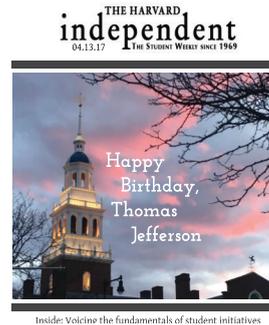

Inside: Voicing the fundamentals of student initiatives and student concerns.

04.13.2017

Vol. XLVIII, No. 21

CONTENTS

The Indy celebrates Thomas Jefferson's birthday through student foundations and principles!

Cover design by Audrey Effenberger '19.

- 3 Yardfest Shortlist
- 4 Visitas Veritas
- 5 Institutions of Politics
- 6 Open Campus
- 7 Human Trafficking
- 9 Cabot & Clover
- 10 Tell Me More
- 11 Season to Remember

As Harvard College's weekly undergraduate newsmagazine, the Harvard Independent provides in-depth, critical coverage of issues and events of interest to the Harvard College community. The Independent has no political affiliation, instead offering diverse commentary on news, arts, sports, and student life.

For publication information, email subscriptions, and general inquiries, contact President Daniel Um (president@harvardindependent.com). Letters to the Editor and comments regarding the content of the publication should be addressed to Editor-in-Chief Caroline Cronin (editorinchief@harvardindependent.com).

The Harvard Independent is published weekly during the academic year, except during vacations, by The Harvard Independent, Inc., Student Organization Center at Hilles, Box 201, 59 Shepard Street, Cambridge, MA 02138.

Copyright © 2017 by The Harvard Independent.
All rights reserved.

President
Editor-in-Chief
Vice-President,
Publishing

Daniel Um '19
Caroline Cronin '18
Hunter Richards '18

News Editor
Forum Editor
Arts Editor
Sports Editor
Podcast Editor

Pulkit Agarwal '19
Megan Sims '18
Hunter Richards '19
Tushar Dwivedi '20
Kelsey O'Connor '18

Design Editor
Staff Photographer

Audrey Effenberger '19
Francesca Cornero '19

Staff Writers

Andrew Adler '17
Aditya Agrawal '17
Jess Clay '17
Peyton Fine '17
Caroline Gentile '17
Emily Hall '18
Ritchey Howe '17
Hannah Kates '18
Hunter Richards '18
Chris Riley '17
Sally Yi '18

Find us online!

@HarvardIndy

soundcloud.com/harvardindy

Yardfest feat. VagueHandGestures

Performers we don't have to wait for.

By HUNTER RICHARDS

There's only a little over a week left until Yardfest, but the College Events Board has yet to announce who will be performing. We haven't felt this played since Frank Ocean strung us along until giving us hope with that livestream of him building an Ikea desk. With all the rumors of who might be coming or who might have canceled, it's not hard to understand why Harvard students have so many trust issues. While we're all starting to feel like Yardfest is a social experiment or that past years may have been a collective fever dream, we still want to have some optimism that we'll get another college-wide event for which to get trashed. In the event that CEB falls short and can't provide, the Indy has some ins. Here are some of the potential Yardfest performers we can get on the fly.

Your roommate's alarm clock

That little digital clock they've had since middle school sure does have pipes. After sharing a double with them freshman year, there are now some sound frequencies you can no longer pick up on from prolonged exposure. You heard it going off just this morning at 8 am, and it held strong until noon when your roommate finally admitted they weren't making it to their 10 am today either. Forget any rumors about the artist canceling – this lil' bad boy has been going strong without fail since your roommate started denying they weren't a morning person during orientation and have yet to admit they'll never wake up early to go for a run.

Canvas notification ping

Okay, maybe electronic isn't exactly your thing but after your last Gen Ed you can name all of Canvas's albums because those notifications are the most reliable aspect of your life. This is more emo techno than anything, but only because every time you hear the notification you die a little more inside until you're back to feeling like a sad middle schooler.

The dull roar of final clubs

There's nothing like the sound of a school of salmon shorts swimming upstream through a river of spilled beer to get you riled up. Do you think they're called boat shoes because of how much alcohol they can take on without capsizing? They're first album, "Who Do You Know Here," is still a classic and their singles, "Sorry, Our Grad Board Said No" always get the crowd going.

The resounding roar of Khurana about final clubs

His most famous single, "The Mission of the College," may not be your favorite but you have to admit you bumped his album, "Transformative Experience," alone in your room during finals last semester. Some of his recent work, like "Bridge Programs are for Every Other Peer Institution" and "---*" (*Pronounced "silent" or "nonsensical," like how he is on questions of why he isn't more supportive of first gen, low income students) is really taking off. You're allowed to nod along because some of your closest friends are in final clubs and gave you permission. Just make sure to keep it on the DL and name the playlist you put his tracks on something discreet, like "Bridge Program."

Memorial Church's Bells at 8:40 am even though you don't have class until 11

Talk about bringing the hype – nobody could fall asleep through a performance from the most consistent reminder that some people actually like to see the sun rise. If you thought people were pissed when the Chainsmokers were rumored to be performing, just wait until people get word about this shit. Nothing can unite a group of people like a shared hatred for early wake up calls.

The Shuttle pulling away as you run after it

There's a certain "whoosh" that the shuttle has as it accelerates away from the stop you just got to. Maybe it's the blood pumping in your ears as you chase after it, or maybe it's just your conscious scolding you for taking the extra 3 minutes to steal enough oranges from the dining hall to give you scurvy immunity in the case of another dining hall strike.

Will whoever, or whatever, performs at Yardfest stack up against this list? It's a wonder CEB hasn't made an announcement when these options already exist!

Hunter Richards (hrichards@college.harvard.edu) wonders if Khurana will hold a Town Hall on this newest of controversies.

Veritas... but Less Truth

...More posing for the sake of pre-frosh.

By HUNTER RICHARDS

The weeks leading up to Visitas provide an opportunity to reflect on how much Harvard has changed you. I mean, for goodness sake, there was a time sophomore year when you actually thought getting bangs was the move... Thankfully, you found roommates who will keep you humble and limit your horrible life decisions to hooking up with section kid and blacking out before making it to Harvard-Yale instead of something drastic like throwing out all your junk food because you want to be healthier. But your metamorphosis since your own Visitas weekend does not have to taint the experience of the newbies. Here are just a few helpful pointers to help you prepare to be a good host and not come off as the jaded mess you are now.

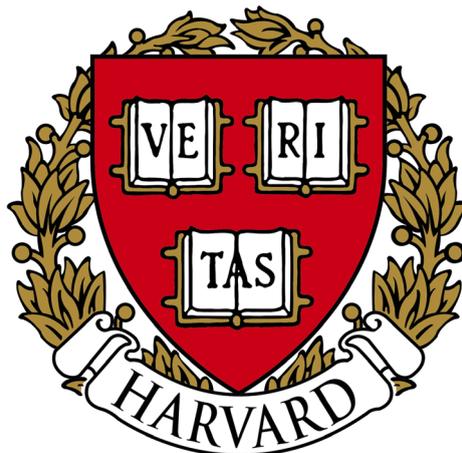

Set your alarm for the class you've skipped all semester

When your pre-frosh are here, it's important to remind them that college is still about classes. Keep in mind that you removed the reminder that you have lecture from your GCal entirely after add/drop period when you realized class was recorded. It might be a good idea to at least try waking up before it's over. You don't necessarily have to go, but the facade that you're awake and going to be sitting in the front row of Science Center B at 10 am is enough to trick excited pre-frosh. As an added perk, the early rising of the pre-frosh for special events may imbue you with the freshness of your younger years (before you realized what being a morning person actually entailed.)

Block your booty calls

There's nothing worse than going from the really kind host who offers to show them how the dhall grill works and explain the difference between Radcliffe Yard and the Quad, to the shitty upperclassmen who left them locked out of the suite until you returned with your hair in disarray and your underwear shoved into your purse at 2 am. Make sure that you're going to be free of distractions for Visitas so that your pre-frosh won't ultimately base their decision to come to Harvard on the atmosphere of House hallways late at night.

...ish.

Figure out where the obscure buildings are

You do STEM and have never heard of Robinson Hall, let alone know where the philosophy department might be located. Pre-frosh are eager and still full of life, and you can bet they're going to be asking a lot of questions about where every building might be for events. Being asked about Yenching Library still brings you back to the good ol' days when Yenching Restaurant was still alive and well, but you'll learn to hide the pain and answer as if your chest isn't aching just a little bit for those quality dinners.

Clean your room

You know that you're definitely not going to have time to clean the night before your pre-frosh arrives, even though you keep promising yourself that you will. You know damn well that you have a problem set due the day before and will be passed out after Yardfest and likely will sleep through picking them up from Agassiz Saturday morning. So there is no time like the present! Just start picking up things here and there, maybe even throw out those old leftovers from Kong that have been in your common room fridge since your last round of midterms. If you are feeling particularly ambitious, you might even wash those "kind of clean, could wear again" outfits with the rest of your dirty clothes. Really, you're not fooling anyone.

The worn-out motto of the University, and its many iterations, may be to you just the stamp on your waffles. But to pre-frosh, it is the founding of a four-year experience with plenty of shows put on and togetherness feigned for the sake of others.

Hunter Richards (hrichards@college.harvard.edu) embraces this Visitas showing and hopes to end the weekend a little brighter-eyed than when she began it.

Institutionalizing Politics in a Post-Trump World

IOP forums in context.

By PULKIT AGARWAL

In light of recent events across the political world—through a series of upheavals that started with Brexit and culminated in the election of President Trump last November—there has been a substantial decline in the credibility of public institutions. Interestingly, this trend has not been limited only to the bodies of government, but has also been salient among media, think tanks, and expert political opinion more generally. How does a body such as the Institute of Politics, then, reposition itself to both communicate its disillusionment with the current political environment, and keep people engaged in discussions on subjects of critical importance to the nation? We ask this question keeping in mind recent events at the JFK Forum, and seek to understand its implications in the near-term.

On Tuesday April 11, the forum hosted an event titled “The Road to Citizenship,” The 2017 Pollak Lecturer delivered by a retired Four-Star General of the United States Army and founder of the McChrystal Group, General Stanley McChrystal. The event was moderated by Dean and Don K. Price Professor of Public Policy at Harvard Kennedy School, Douglas Elmendorf, and although it did not entail a question-answer exchange of the conventional kind, it exemplified the Institute’s grappling with its reformed role on campus.

The General spoke at length on the subject of defining an attitude for citizenship, one which is built on “a culture of service.” Although many of his allusions to the possibility of a year of national service for young people aged 18-28, either civil or military, could have been obviously critiqued on standard grounds of individual liberty, this time they were accepted rather warmly by the audience. Liberals across the country have taken all-the-more willingly to the idea of picking up responsibility for civil institutions, it would appear, and undoubtedly, the IOP’s own purpose of engaging young people in public discourse is of paramount importance in times such as these. As the lecture asserted, the conversation about civic responsibility is one that young people across the nation ought to take seriously in a post-Trump world.

But there is more to this notion of citizenship that the IOP has attempted to advocate through several events this year. General McChrystal mentioned that the value of a resource “increases because it is not open to everyone.” In other words, citizenship is akin to membership to a club, an elite institution, or even an empire. It is a “valued privilege” that people ought to respect to maintain its desirability. Surely, there is reason to believe that such conceptions of citizenship—and by extension nationality—may be discriminatory; but to do so would be to miss a larger point, that is: for young America, the value of its civil institutions may erode over the course of the next few years if action isn’t taken now. This is not to say that the privilege of US citizenship, per se, must be kept from outsiders who seek it. It is merely a reflection of the task that this administration may leave future generations with, to preserve the desirability of this citizenship in the first place, and of the responsibility that all its bearers must accept.

It may not be unprecedented for the IOP to have endorsed such impassioned voices on the defense of public institutions, or even citizenship; after all, some would argue that is precisely the Institute’s mandate. But the environment within which it operates is vastly different today than it once was. The appointment of Gina McCarthy, President Obama’s EPA Administrator, as a Spring Fellow, of Ashton Carter, former Secretary of Defense, as head of the Belfer Center for Science and International Affairs, and many others, indicate the Institute’s continued efforts to not let its guard down like many others in the conversation have. It remains committed, clearly, to not succumb to a loud, fringe ideology, even if it may occupy power today. We must in turn play our part, and claim citizenship, responsibility, and action.

Pulkit Agarwal (pulkitagarwal@college.harvard.edu) asks the same questions in his own life that the Forum asks of its speakers.

Open Campus Initiative Shakes Up College Life

A new organization holds first event.

By EMILY HALL

On Monday evening, new student organization the Harvard College Open Campus Initiative hosted its first event on campus, despite backlash from other student groups. They hosted Dr. Jordan Peterson, a professor at the University of Toronto who has recently come under fire for a video series decrying political correctness, in an event titled “Mask of Compassion: Postmodernism & Neomarxism in Modern Times.”

The group, which consists of a small number of students who have come together to promote free speech on campus by bringing controversial speakers, is itself nonpartisan but has scheduled more conservative speakers so far, as it believes that these are the perspectives which are not adequately represented on campus.

Despite a great deal of social media backlash to Dr. Peterson’s appearance on campus, the event went peacefully (far more so than did Harvard College Consulting Group’s foray at bringing Martin Shkreli to campus earlier this semester – no fire alarms were pulled). Peaceful protesters stood outside with music and signs that read “Trans Love = Power” and students stood outside the lecture hall distributing flyers about the speaker and their opinions.

Moderator Akash Wasil ’19, a member of the Open Campus Initiative, asked Dr. Peterson questions that ranged widely in scope; he often challenged Peterson to defend, explain, and expand on some of his more controversial statements.

The first of these statements was Peterson’s objection to the use of preferred gender pronouns. This stance, which prompted his recent rise to notoriety among college students, is two-pronged—he says that he both rejects the argument that government has the right to regulate the content of individuals’ speech, and he simply does not want to use those pronouns. He did note, however, that no transgender individual had ever asked him personally if he would be willing to refer to them using their preferred pronouns. He continued by asserting that identity is not a subjective experience, but a fact of biology and perhaps sociocultural phenomena. This prompted a number of attendees to hold up flyers printed by the University’s Office of BGLTQ Student Life that read, “Get the facts about gender diversity. Stop transphobia.” and “Trans Love Is Power.”

Dr. Peterson’s commentary then moved onto the topic of Neomarxism on college campuses today, focusing sharp critiques particularly on student activism and humanities education. He did not parse words when criticizing campus activists, including some who have been known to carry the Soviet hammer-and-sickle flag when protesting. Peterson even gave advice to students who want to avoid having protesters at their events. If you hold the event early in the morning, he said, then those who might protest will “still be sleeping off last night’s pot and alcohol-induced hangover.” However, he did not discourage students who want to make a difference. His advice? If you want to change the world, instead of “shaking paper on sticks at people and yelling at them,” he said, you should “get your act together and stop whining and sniffing and go do it.”

Dr. Peterson continued to provoke various expressions of discontent among some members of the audience when he called for the women’s studies discipline to be defunded, calling it an “activist discipline” that provides “full-time destructive employment for doing nothing but cause harm.” He claimed that it is a scam “from top to bottom” because the academic papers that are produced have little intellectual credibility because they lack valid research methods—and then no one reads this research. Instead, he argued, universities should be emphasizing the importance of honing students’ ability to articulate their thoughts and arguments in the most compelling ways—including by exposing them to things they don’t wish to encounter. A university, he argued, has no mandate to offer students safe spaces, because being educated is not “safe”—various disciplines teach painful things that human beings need to know in order to understand how society operates.

Despite the controversy of many of his comments, and the often very disparate reactions among the different groups in the room, there were a few instances that seemed to bring unity to those in attendance, even if only to an extent. First, when asked about what students should aim to do after graduation, Dr. Peterson proclaimed, “If you have any sense then anything you do would be for good,” evoking positive reactions from most, if not all, of the crowd. Secondly, Dr. Peterson garnered a great deal of laughter among attendees in his criticism of those at elite universities who protest against the ruling class—Peterson said “No, you are baby ruling class members; the only reason you’re not rich is because you’re young.” This was perhaps the greatest showing of unified laughter and applause that occurred throughout the entire event.

While many students may not have agreed with Dr. Peterson’s viewpoints, very few would argue that his perspectives and his frankness are commonplace here in Cambridge. For this reason alone, the Open Campus Initiative has succeeded in diversifying the range of viewpoints we hear at Harvard.

Emily Hall (emilyhall@college.harvard.edu) is proud that the Indy also presents a diverse range of opinions.

Convening to Fight Human Trafficking

Intercollegiate coalition holds first annual convention.

By CAROLINE CRONIN

Diana Sheedy '17, Intercollegiate Coalition Against Modern Slavery co-chair. Caroline Cronin

“I remember thinking that I couldn’t imagine anything worse than being exploited as a child and day in and day out knowing that no one is going to come get you.” Such was Diana Sheedy’s first reaction to learning about human trafficking. Sheedy, a senior studying Economics here at Harvard, is driven by this realization and it has prompted her to found and co-chair the Intercollegiate Coalition Against Modern Slavery. This Saturday at the Kennedy School, the Coalition is hosting its first ever leadership convention, the Intercollegiate Convention Against Modern Slavery. Sheedy was so kind as to speak with the Indy about human trafficking today, the coalition, and the aims of the convention.

The life changing realization of how ubiquitous modern slavery is Sheedy had while attending a church event a few years ago has drastically shaped her college experience. The people she has met who have suffered from different forms of exploitation and “realizing how deep those wounds are” convinced her that “this is the most worthy thing I could ever work on.”

After her initial inspiration, Sheedy reached out to a small group on campus that was just beginning to do research on Harvard’s procurement in regards to labor exploitation. The plan was to help shape Harvard’s “procurement policies so they have better human rights standards for their vendors.” As Sheedy became involved, the group transitioned into a partnership with the University that plans to put out a first draft of a procurement policy at the end of April.

Sheedy expressed that the policy research done in tandem with the University has been a positive collaboration. But she notes that academia and other formal ways of discussing human trafficking “tends to be such a narrow focus and you don’t get to see how it influences different sectors and especially how the issue is evolving with technology.” Sheedy states, “It is an issue in itself but it connects to so many things like discrimination, or poverty, or child sexual abuse, or immigration. There are a lot of complicated pieces. It is still viewed as more of a static issue – what it is instead of how it is evolving.”

This past summer Sheedy and the like-minded individuals involved with the research initiative got together to discuss their goals and how they wanted to work on this cause. “Where we saw the biggest gap,” was within the “roles of students,” Sheedy said. They asked, “what can we do as students that is really using our role to our advantage? What we realized was that the research work was a huge collaborative effort with other schools.” They learned a lot from other schools, but saw this tendency of schools to only work within their campus and not reach out to other schools. “Harvard had no idea what MIT was doing or what BU was doing and there are 200 schools in Boston and none of us are really working together. So we first wanted to see more students from other schools collaborate. And secondly, there are a few really passionate people on this but there is high student turnover so how do you really train the students who want to work on this and help them feel equipped to do this work.” As is often the case with the fast pace of college life and the even faster time in which four years at Harvard passes you by, leaving with the knowledge that you made the most of your time and opportunities is a prize highly sought after.

Human Trafficking Convention, continued.

Sheedy further relates it to campus culture: “With things like consulting and finance, people attach a sense of quality and rigor to that work and then human rights work seems to be like a nice little thought. The reality is when you’re dealing with human lives you need really qualified professionals, you need the highest, most intense analysis. The human rights field has been doing a lot but there is a long way to go, especially in bringing that intensity back to students.” In so many words Sheedy has expressed the criticism many have of Harvard and institutions like it: why are we churning out Wall Street suits when we have all the talent and smarts necessary to save the world right here in Cambridge?

Saving the world may not have been what Sheedy had in mind when she founded the Intercollegiate Coalition Against Modern Slavery, but saving just a little part of it is exactly what it intends to do. “When we thought about the convention we decided not to do a traditional conference because we didn’t want to just [superficially] educate people who were probably pretty interested already. So we have been going out of our way to contact student leaders and to make this practical and skills-based. Whatever initiatives they go off and do, either on campus or afterwards, they feel more equipped to do that knowing it’s influenced by experts and knowing what is going on in the field. Whatever it is, we want them to feel more empowered.”

Since Sheedy’s group is currently unrecognized by the college, the convention is sponsored by the Carr Center for Human Rights at the Kennedy School. Sheedy and her colleagues want the “framework [of the convention] to help people see where their biases lie,” and help people “recognize how those biases shape their initiatives.” This emphasis on intersectionality and realizing that issues transcend traditional categorization is one that is underlined by many student groups at this point in time. And so, the convention is broken into a series of sessions that include amazing speakers and student-led discussions so that all attending can learn from each other and reach outside their current skills bases.

The logistics of the convention and how Sheedy began this group should not take away from the true horrors that exist within the worlds of human trafficking and modern slavery. Sheedy stresses taking care of oneself while learning about these issues and facing failure in the face of human rights endeavors. She is grateful for a strong support group within the Coalition and among her family and friends.

For Sheedy there are three important things to remember: “First is knowing what keeps you motivated. There are many times that I just had to let myself feel the emotions and not to become numb when you talk about these things from an academic or formal level. Just remembering that as your fuel for why you do what you do is important because at the end of the day no matter how much you fail, every effort forward is going to help. I could never imagine looking back and feeling like I didn’t give everything I could to these people.” Sheedy knows that keeping such a perspective is crucial to the work she does.

“Secondly, having a great support network – from students to teachers to mentors to family members – having people to give encouragement and keep you focused and honest,” is what helps Sheedy remember what she wants to do and how she is capable of achieving it. The Coalition is comprised of a number of dedicated students from multiple schools that each bring so much to the team and make it even stronger. The goal of collaboration is unachievable without the talent and efforts of every individual involved.

The final of three necessary components of her fight: “having a larger narrative underneath your initiative.” The Coalition has the convention and it also has the research. But beyond that, the collaboration creates a community of people capable of so much more because every individual does what they can. Sheedy compares the weaknesses of human trafficking initiatives to the recycling problem – an individual may not recycle one soda can because that one person doesn’t think that one can save the planet. “Knowing that everything you do helps and keeping that optimism really helps, too.” Because at heart, “you can’t understand these things even at a surface level and not be changed by it.”

Being changed by the knowledge of human trafficking, Sheedy hopes, will inspire people to walk away from the convention just a bit more informed and dedicated. The convention does not measure success by the number of people who attend, but by the simple knowledge that more people than did before know about human trafficking and feel that they can move forward with their own ideas while working alongside other groups, schools, and individuals. Knowledge of human trafficking can be a controversial topic because of the lack of much hard data on the volume of it within society. And Sheedy acknowledges that perfect data may not ever be available in studying the seedy world human trafficking – but “you hear survivors talk and that is enough. Their testimony is enough for us.”

It is enough to inspire Sheedy to fight for a cause she knows affects real people every day. It is enough for a coalition to equip college students with the skills to continue that fight. It is enough to make a difference.

Caroline Cronin (ccronin01@college.harvard.edu) is inspired by the work done and fight begun by the Coalition and knows that this weekend we will come a little closer to winning that fight.

INDY NEWS

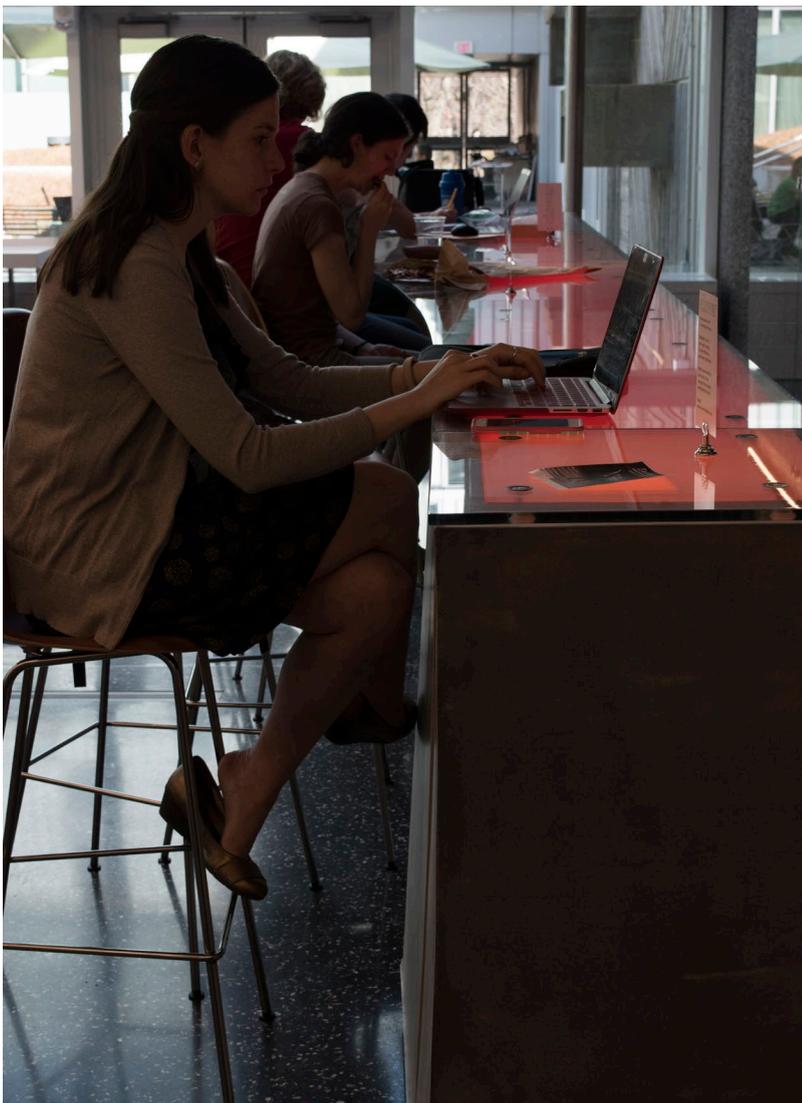

New Cabot Library, Clover to Come

New in the Science Center...
What do students think?

Photos by FRANCESCA CORNERO

“I’m wondering if Clover will take BoardPlus...?” – Alyssa Mehta '18

“[Clover] is not what the majority of students want and it is concerning that Harvard does not consult with the people who will be actually using this library on a regular basis.” – Guy McEleney '19

“While the Cabot space is pretty cool now, miserably trudging through work in a cool space will still be miserably trudging through work.” – Emelia Vigil '18

See more on harvardindependent.com!

Tell Me More

Episode 4: Underwater Vision and Shaping a Lifestyle

By KELSEY O'CONNOR

This week on Tell Me More, Dean Farris '20 talks about his high school swimming coach Mike Norment. Dean talks to Kelsey about Mike's ability to see Dean's potential and the values he helped him to develop both in and out of the water. Dean has made a big difference on the Men's Swimming and Diving team this year, breaking several records at the Ivy League Championships and earning the high score award. From teammates, to coaches, to golf, Dean tells us what has inspired him throughout his career as a swimmer and a student.

tindependent

Sex Survey 2017

Last call for contributors! Email your essays, poems, photos, and more to editorinchief@harvardindependent.com!

A Season to Remember

Recently, my hometown of Chicago has been abuzz in the world of hockey. With the rise and prominence of the Blackhawks, a new pride has enveloped the city that not just complements, but often overrides the typical baseball, basketball, and football interests. However, while I have not been to United Center, Chicago's prime conference championship; their past two victories included 3-0 and 3-2 victories, with their last win over Air Force coming after shutting down the team's comeback attempts in the second and third periods. In the last 18 games before its semifinal match at Minnesota-Duluth, the team had won 17 of team; thus, their hot streak, as well as their consistent dominance all season, awakened the hopes of Harvard fans hoping to see the Frozen four title return to the team.

Crimson Hockey
reinvigorated despite final loss.

By TUSHAR DWIVEDI

[The team's] efforts this entire season, not just in Chicago, resulted in a campus reinvigorated by hockey.

Almost two decades ago, in 1989, the Harvard team rose to a championship victory in a now unique fashion; their most valuable player for the tournament was Ted Donato - current head coach for the Harvard team. Although this season primarily included a string of victories, the coach helped lead them through a lone period of struggle, tremendously successfully. After losing three games within the span of a week, Harvard bounced back under Donato's leadership to win the Beanpot, and extend a winning streak that would last almost 18 games.

Harvard team to pull out a miracle and try to tie. With one final attempt, Harvard's shot bounced off the crossbar, and Minnesota-Duluth advanced to the title game. While the outcome certainly disappointed the team, their efforts this entire season, not just in Chicago, resulted in a campus reinvigorated by hockey. Breaking through the constant expectation of an opening round loss for the past decade and a half, and providing incredible memories through the Beanpot and Ivy Conference Championship victories - that made this season truly one to remember for the team, as well as their many fans here at Harvard.

hockey and basketball stadium, in almost a year, the Harvard's men's ice hockey team just returned from their visit. This visit, however, was far beyond the ordinary. The team was representing Harvard in the Frozen Four for the thirteenth time, and has a storied legacy filled with success. The team, however, had yet to show in the championship since 1994, and their last championship victory was in 1989. As a result, Harvard's most recent trip brought a wave of raised expectations - but more importantly, a wave of excitement that truly transcended the pressure involved in competition.

While Harvard's NCAA tournament representation has been impressive, their success in the opening rounds of play has been limited. Starting in 2002, the team had yet to make it past the opening round in 7 straight appearances, extending all the way until 2016. This year, however, marked for a strong change, as the number two in the country ranked team took down Yale in the initial matches. Following that match, the team then started off strong with a 3-0 lead over Air Force. While Air Force pushed back strong with 2 points in the span of just 15 seconds nearly halfway through the game, Harvard remained steadfast in holding their lead and emerged victorious.

Tushar Dwivedi (tushar_dwivedi@college.harvard.edu) can't wait to return to Chicago and the United Center to see another game of great hockey!

Harvard's journey to the Frozen Four included one of their most dominant regular seasons, in which they won 28 times, to go with few losses. These victories included a Beanpot title as well as the Ivy League

With the game tied at 1-1, both teams, and many fans in the United Center, waited to see who would break the tie with less than a minute left in the semifinal. With Minnesota scoring first, and with just about 27 seconds left in the game, the pressure was on the captured and shot

Sometimes, we all need a little perspective change.

By FRANCESCA CORNERO

